While excavating for a sewer in Wilmington workmen came upon the remains of a corduroy road which more than sixty years ago was laid with timbers cut from the adjoining woods and served to keep vehicles from sinking into the mire of primeval days. These logs were of oak, hickory, ash and other varieties, and were imbedded four to five feet below the surface of the present macadamized street. Through these long years they have remained in perfect condition, blackened of course, and all, except the ash, solid and firm. Bark on the hickory logs retained its natural shape, with all ridges and scars of nativity.
